Life Unworthy of Life: The Liberal Campaign Against the Young and the Disabled combines five years of investigative media research, exclusive interviews with women affected by the new eugenics, and narrative journalism to connect the dots between moral relativism and the culture of death.

On Moral Relativism and Connecting the Dots:

A high school teacher tells a class that aliens have landed in the courtyard and that perception is based on reality. A local book club discussion features moral relativists and other Holocaust-denying liberals who deny a system of right and wrong. And pro-abortion pundits ignore scientific facts in favor of moral relativism, building on the aforementioned ideologies.

On the Culture of Death:

Meanwhile, a baby is left to die in a hospital closet after a “botched” abortion. After killing their newborn, a New Jersey couple is let off with paltry sentences of one or two years in jail and get out early. Pro-abortion organization NOW and pro-abortion Newsweek columnist Anna Quindlen both defend Andrea Yates after she drowns her five children in the tub, mocking those who disagree as “yappers.” And a pro-abortion woman kills her unborn child because she doesn’t want to buy extra jars of mayonnaise at Costco, and another claims that she puts more thought into decorating her kitchen than considering her unborn child.

On the New Eugenics:

In England, a woman has an abortion because the child has a cleft lip and palate, a fixable, non-fatal cosmetic flaw. Another unborn child is killed for having club foot. One mother even has an abortion because she didn’t like the looks of the father and feared the baby would resemble him. More unborn children are killed simply because they have Down syndrome or have dwarfism. The husband of the Roe v. Wade lawyer who helped legalize abortion-on-demand writes to President Clinton to get him to approve the abortion pill RU 486, in order to kill more poor people. In France, a judge grants an award to parents of disabled child because the child exists; the parents sued their doctor because they would have killed their unborn child had they known he was disabled (but they say they still love him, of course).

On Free Market Frankenstein:

Researchers create biological grotesqueries, including beings that are part human and part animal. Others open the door to the possibility of someone having an aborted child as a mother and for a child to have two biological mothers or two biological fathers. Businesses and universities buy organs and tissues of killed unborn children for research. A South Korean scientist states he has cloned an embryo and killed it for stem cells, fooling the entire mainstream media as well as the respected scientific journal Science in the process.
